He shares, "When I wonder why, after applying noteworthy effort, some idea just still isn't where I can grasp it, I tilt my face toward the night sky, look upward and across, seeking an audience with a moonbeam, hoping the answer is contained somewhere within its sheet of radiance, waiting to be revealed."

During his childhood, the author recalled an incident where he stole three cars and drove from Washington to a place close to the border in California before he was nabbed. After he was reunited with his family, both of his parents asked about the incident.

"Why did you steal that car," his parents asked him. Mr. Staudenraus replied that he wanted to go to California "to write a book." That's where everything started – how his journey in writing blossomed.
